His father, the late Benjamin Smart, of Rock Mills, Warwick, from a peculiar view of the obnoxious distinctions of titles, named his eldest son as above, another was named Master Benjamin, and a third Prince Benjamin, so as to compel the use of these names so as to distinguish them. It failed, of course, in practice, as they were dropped out of the family, and sometimes proved a disadvantage as the children grew up. The young man was a steady Friend, though not a member of the Society; and all

Was a nephew of Jane Wighan, Edinburgh, and nephew of William and Robert Smeal, editors of The British Friend. Began as a surgeon in Edinburgh at 21, but was threatened with T.B. and got an appointment as surgeon on the "Morning Light" bound for Aust. and N.Z. His health was restored and he went as surgeon with a private party of business men bound either on business or pleasure to the Feegee Islands. The vessel struck a coral reef, all were lost except the captain and James Smeal. They clung to the same spar for 4 hours, then were thrown on to a barren rock. They were 3 days and nights without food, and cut up their boots to chew. The All Seeing Eye sent a vessel to them. James Smeal ultimately reached Melbourne and wrote from there on 24 vii 1861 (2 months after the wreck) He had gone to Tarraville, Gippsland, to try to set up a practice, having borrowed money. He asks Melbourne Friends to correspond with him and keep him in care. (81)
